Reporters Banned from Senate Floor Again

(Texas Tribune) The Texas Senate will bar news reporters from the chamber floor in the upcoming legislative session, which begins Tuesday, continuing a measure introduced two years ago as a COVID-19 precaution even as state officials publicly rail against other requirements to reduce the spread of the virus.

The news was first reported by The Dallas Morning News. In an email to the newspaper, Patsy Spaw, the Senate secretary, said press access in the chamber has not changed since last session. "There is no floor seating for the press," she wrote. "The reserved area for the press was moved to the Senate gallery in the southwest corner."

Spaw did not immediately respond to a request for comment from The Texas Tribune. Lt. Gov. Dan Patrick, who presides over the chamber, also did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

The move means news reporters will have less access to senators. Under the rules implemented in 2021 — ostensibly as measures to prevent the spread of COVID-19 — reporters were moved to the Senate gallery on the third floor. The senators conduct their business on the second floor.

Reporters are still expected to have floor access in the Legislature's other chamber, the House of Representatives. "The Texas House has historically allowed credentialed media in designated areas on the chamber floor," said Cassi Pollock, a spokesperson for House Speaker Dade Phelan. "The temporary exception to this practice during COVID was repealed in April 2021, and the chamber will continue to follow the long-standing practice of allowing credentialed media in designated areas on the House floor."

Reporters will be allowed at the press table on the House floor for the chamber's opening ceremony Tuesday. After that, the 150 members of the House will vote on the chamber's rules, including press access.
