Secret Military Documents Posted Online

NPR reports that The Justice Department has joined the Pentagon in an urgent effort to determine how secret military documents on the war in Ukraine made their way onto multiple social media sites.

A small number of documents, including some marked "top secret," were found on Twitter and Telegram on Wednesday. Since then, journalists, researchers, and social media sleuths have uncovered additional classified documents posted as early as March 1 on additional sites. This raises a host of questions about how widespread the breach may be and how much damage it could cause.

Pentagon officials acknowledge the documents are real and say they are investigating. The Department of Justice said Friday evening it has also opened an investigation and is working with the Department of Defense.

There's no word on who might be responsible for leaking or stealing the documents. Some of those posting the documents on social media appear to be individuals hiding behind an alias, and they seem to be reposting versions they came across elsewhere.

NPR has viewed documents on a number of sites, including Twitter, Telegram, Discord and 4chan. In addition to Ukraine, some of the documents provide assessments of China and countries in the Middle East.

The online posts show photos of physical documents that were folded and creased in some instances. Some are dated to late February or early March and appear to be part of a slide deck produced daily for top U.S. military and other national security officials. One document is labeled "Top Secret," and is titled "Status of the Conflict as of 1 March." It gives a detailed battlefield summary from Ukraine on that day.

Military analysts say they believe the original versions of the documents were slightly altered in some instances.

The public disclosure of classified material on the Ukraine war is both alarming and embarrassing for the U.S., and Russia is sure to scrutinize the documents.
