Recession on the Horizon?

(CNN) Warnings of a potential recession aren't surprising given how many tripwires there are in today's economy.

A push by the Federal Reserve to raise interest rates and combat high inflation. Supply chain shortages. An ongoing global health crisis. And of course, the geopolitical earthquake caused by Russia's invasion of Ukraine, which is also threatening to create a world food crisis.

Even if the US doesn't fall into a recession -- and there are signs it may not -- there are plenty of economic headwinds that could have potentially negative effects on your finances. Here are ways to assess your situation and guard against losses. With ultra-low unemployment and plenty of openings, it's a job seeker's market right now. But if there's a recession, that could change quickly. So make hay while you can.

Cash in on the housing boom. If you've been on the fence about selling your home, now might be the time to make the leap. The housing market has been on a tear, with year-over-year prices up 19.8% in February, according to the latest S&P CoreLogic Case-Shiller home price report. But mortgage rates are also on the rise, which may dampen demand. "I would suggest that anyone planning to put their house on the market do so right away," said Adam.

Cover your near-term cash needs. Having liquid assets to cover you in emergencies or severe market downturns is always a good idea. But it's especially crucial when facing big events beyond your control -- including layoffs, which typically increase during recessions.

That means having enough money set aside in cash, money market funds or short-term fixed income instruments to cover several months of living expenses, emergencies or any big, anticipated expense (e.g., a down payment or college tuition)
