A Tough Year for Teachers

A story from the Texas Tribune tells us that across the state, teachers in Texas are finishing out one of the toughest years they have ever seen. A global pandemic closed schools and forced more than 5 million public school students onto laptops and desktop computers at home.

This was to be the successful road back to normalcy for public schools. But after two large COVID-19 surges, a year of angry school board meetings, parents claiming teachers were grooming kids for abuse, and fights over everything from mask mandates for students to what books they can read, teachers were already at a breaking point with nearly 500 quitting even if it meant losing their license.

Even before the horrific shooting in Uvalde, the mood among Texas teachers has been one of resignation. Literally.

(from front) And that's on top of a teacher shortage the state was experiencing before the pandemic that is now exacerbated by the return to school, forcing Gov. Greg Abbott to create a commission to come up with solutions.

Public education advocates and teachers themselves, fear that this latest incident will be the breaking point for teachers that were already considering leaving the profession since the pandemic hit. All while Texas is already facing a teacher shortage.

School Safety in Texas

(Texas Tribune) School safety measures are largely up to individual school districts, but the state does mandate they enact some policies.

"There's no one aspect of school safety that addresses the needs of all campuses, so the state has an approach that is really broad in terms of the different options that schools use," said Joy Baskin, legal director for the Texas Association of School Boards.

Since 2005, the state has required schools to have emergency operation plans in place, said Kathy Martinez-Prather of the Texas School Safety Center.

Does every school have police officers assigned to campuses?

Law enforcement and security presence in schools is left up to each school district in Texas. School districts can choose to employ school resource officers, who report to a local law enforcement agency, or commissioned peace officers, who often report to school district leaders. Both are licensed by the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement and receive training from the Texas School Safety Center, according to TASB.

Schools can also employ or contract with security officers not licensed by the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement, but they may be required to be registered and verified by the Texas School Safety Center

Who can carry a gun in Texas schools?

While Texas leaders have loosened gun laws, including by eliminating the requirement for a license to carry a handgun in 2021, schools are generally considered gun-free zones under federal and state laws except in certain circumstances.

A 1990 federal law bans firearms on school property or within 1,000 feet of public and private schools, but the law makes exceptions for law enforcement and individuals licensed to carry. Other exceptions include if the gun is not loaded and is locked away or if the individual has been authorized to carry a gun by the district. Texas also generally bans guns where school-sponsored activities take place, unless an individual is exempted.

Teachers and school staff can carry a gun under a state-run school marshals program, which is overseen by the Texas Commission on Law Enforcement and requires 80 hours of training. Another 2021 state law now allows school marshals to carry concealed guns around students instead of storing them in lockers.

School districts can also pass their own policy authorizing certain individuals to carry guns in their buildings. The policies, often referred to as "guardian plans," are determined by districts and do not have uniform requirements, said Martinez-Prather.

In most cases, school districts use this option to authorize commissioned peace officers in school district police departments to carry a gun, but it can also be used to authorize other school staff, according to the Texas Association of School Boards.

Texas requires schools to have emergency plans and conduct safety drills. But a lot of decisions about safety are left to school districts and charter schools.
