Drought-Stressed Trees

Only mid-way through June and Texas has already seen extreme heat and very little rain this summer, with the trend predicted to continue.

Drought is defined by a relatively long duration with substantially below-normal precipitation, usually occurring over a large area, and Texas is no stranger to drought. According to the US Drought Monitor, in 2011 more than 80% of Texas experienced exceptional drought conditions.

According to experts at Texas A&M Forest Service, tree fatalities occur during a drought because drought is a significant stress to trees.

"A stress is anything that reduces the capacity of the tree to function efficiently and grow vigorously," said Karl Flocke, Texas A&M Forest Service Woodland Ecologist.

Drought alone may not kill your trees, though it could be the tipping domino of tree mortality and should be cause for concern.

"Most trees usually die from a combination of different stresses," said Courtney Blevins, Texas A&M Forest Service Urban Forester. "One of the biggest stresses we see in Texas is drought. When that happens, stresses build up and secondary pests or diseases can establish in trees."

The most helpful way to reduce stress to your tree during drought conditions is to give supplemental water – though the amount and how often you water will depend on your specific tree and area.

"Watering is going to depend on the tree; the size, species and age of the tree as well as the soils you have in your area," said Flocke.

If you begin to see signs of stress in your trees and the ground under your trees is extremely dry, it's time to begin watering. To test the dryness of the soil, you can take a long screwdriver and stick it in the ground. If the screwdriver doesn't go easily six to eight inches into the soil, it's time to water.

"Start by watering the area around the canopy of the tree," said Flocke. "Not just at the base of the tree and not just around the edge of the dripline but water the entire area underneath the canopy of the tree until the point where you have water start pooling and running off the surface."
