From Texas A&M Forestry Service

Current Situation August 2, 2022 at 7:30 a.m.

Yesterday, Texas A&M Forest Service firefighters responded to 16 new wildfires that burned approximately 341 acres. Suppression efforts continued on several carryover wildfires as well.

The upper-level ridge of high pressure that is responsible for the hot and dry conditions impacting much of Texas over the past several weeks is forecast to move back over the state Sunday through Wednesday. Widespread triple-digit temperatures will once again become commonplace across the state. With slightly higher wind speeds, the fire environment will support wildfire ignitions.

Persistent temperatures above 100 degrees will continue to draw moisture from live vegetation. Mid-July live fuel samples in the Cross Timbers, Rolling Plains and Hill Country are at critical levels, making tree torching, or the transition of fire from the ground to the canopy of trees, likely with elevated fire weather conditions.

Texas A&M Forest Service monitors live fuel moistures across the state. The data collected from these sample sites is used to determine the condition of vegetation and assists fire managers in deciding where to position resources.

99 days to Gubernatorial Election

With less than 100 days until the November General Election, arguably the biggest race in Texas is heating up.

The battle to be governor is close and there are some key issues that could help both sides. As the days wind down to Nov. 8, the passion of each candidate's supporters is still at a fever pitch.

Brandon Rottinghaus is a political science professor at the University of Houston. A UH poll taken last month showed Democrat Beto O'Rourke trailing incumbent Republican Gov. Greg Abbott by five points among likely voters.

Rottinghaus said he thinks inflation and immigration, specifically border security, are two of the top issues.

On Monday, Abbott invited the mayors of (cont'd on back)

(cont'd from front) Washington D.C. and New York to the Texas-Mexico border to see what he called a "humanitarian and security crisis."

Rottinghaus also said abortion, the power grid and gun control are all issues Democrats could use to draw independent voters to close the gap.

"This is gonna be a war of messaging. Whoever can determine what the agenda should be is going to be the winner," he said.

Delivering the message

Rottinghaus said there's a big difference in how each candidate gets that message to voters.

Abbott is hitting the airwaves while O'Rourke is hitting the road. The challenger is currently in the middle of a 49-day, 5,600-mile statewide tour.

News Organizations Filing Lawsuit against DPS

More than a dozen news organizations filed a lawsuit against the Texas Department of Public Safety on Monday, accusing the agency of unlawfully withholding public records related to the May school shooting in Uvalde.

The organizations — which include The Texas Tribune and its partner ProPublica and other local, state and national newsrooms — have each filed requests under the Texas Public Information Act for information detailing the response by various authorities, including law enforcement, to the massacre .

DPS has refused to release records in response to these requests, even as the agency has selectively disclosed some information through public testimony, third-party analyses and news conferences.

"In the immediate aftermath of the tragedy, and continuing throughout the ensuing two months, DPS has declined to provide any meaningful information in response to the Request regarding the events of that day — despite the awful reality that some 376 members of law enforcement responded to the tragedy, and hundreds of those were in the school or on school property not going into the unlocked classroom where the gunman continued killing helpless youth," the lawsuit states. "At the same time, DPS has offered conflicting accounts regarding the response of law enforcement, the conduct of its officers, the results of its own investigation, and the agency's justifications for withholding information from the public."

A comprehensive report released in July by a Texas House of Representatives committee found numerous law enforcement agencies, including the state police, failed to aggressively confront the gunman, who killed 19 students and two teachers over the course of about 77 minutes. DPS has provided little information about the actions of its 91 officers who responded to the scene.

Under state law, records are presumed public unless a government body cites a specific exemption under the Public Information Act that allows information to be withheld.

DPS is claiming an exemption for records related to an ongoing in, Uvalde County District Attorney Christina Mitchell Busbee, has acknowledged that she is not conducting a criminal investigation.

The records requested include emails; body camera and other video footage; call logs, 911 and other emergency communications; interview notes; forensic and ballistic records; and lists of DPS personnel who responded to the tragedy, among other information.

"these important public records. We ask that the court grant our petition so that the people of Texas can understand the truth about what happened."
