Phone Bills Going Up

Some Texans can expect their phone bills to go up starting this month after the Public Utility Commission of Texas adopted a rate hike in July.

The commission, which regulates the state's electric, telecommunication, and water and sewer utilities, voted to increase the Texas Universal Service Fund surcharge, which telecommunication companies are required to pay to help maintain and operate cellphone services in rural parts of the state. The surcharge, which is based on the cost those companies pay to provide long-distance service within the state, (cont'd on back)

(cont'f from front) will go up from 3.3% to 24%. Telecom companies typically pass those costs on to customers, according to the Universal Service Fund fact sheet.

The new rate took effect Aug. 1 and will have varying effects on Texans' phone bills. According to the Houston Chronicle, Texans with typical individual cellphone plans will have to pay a few dollars more each month. The increase will be higher for those with family plans and those who pay per-minute rates.

The Texas Universal Service Fund helps about 4 million Texans in rural parts of the state obtain basic telecommunications services.

Since the fund's inception, the surcharge has fluctuated multiple times. The move to increase the rate to 24% came after a court determined the PUC was failing to make adequate payments from the universal fund to rural telecommunications and ordered the commission to restore $200 million in overdue money to the fund, the Houston Chronicle reported.

The fund is vital to the cellphone network in rural Texas and in keeping 911 service available in those parts of the state, said Mark Seale, executive director of the Texas Telephone Association, which represents the incumbent local exchange telephone companies of Texas. Without the fund, large parts of Texas could have little to no connectivity.

"Rural providers and our customers didn't ask for such a dramatic rate increase, and will work to continue to seek a longer-term, more affordable alternative to keep the universal service fund viable," Seale said
